In a very short period of time the Internet has had a profound impact on the way we live. Since the Internet was made operational in 1983, it has lowered both the costs of communication and the barriers to creative expression. It has challenged old business models and enabled new ones. It has provided access to information on a scale never before achievable. It succeeded because we designed it to be flexible and open. These two features have allowed it to accommodate innovation without massive changes to its infrastructure. An open, borderless and standardized platform assured its rapid success. The beauty of an open platform is that there are no gatekeepers. For centuries, access to and creation of information was controlled by the few. The Internet has changed that—and is rapidly becoming the platform for everyone, by everyone. Today there are only about 2.3 billion Internet users, representing roughly 30% of the world's population. Much of the information that they can access online is in English, but this is changing rapidly. The technological progress of the Internet has also set social change in motion.

Security is an increasingly important issue and cannot be ignored. If there is an area of vital research and development for the Internet, this is one of them. The Internet is a tool of the people, built by the people for the people and it must stay that way.

Excessive use of plastic bags and their unregulated disposal has been choking lakes, ponds and urban sewage systems, the Supreme Court said while warning that it posed a threat more serious than the atom bomb for the next generation. This observation from a bench of Justices came on a PIL filed by two Andhra Pradesh-based NGOs drawing the court's attention to 30–60 kg of plastic bags recovered from the stomachs of cows because of irresponsible disposal of plastic bags and defunct municipal waste collection system. The court issued notice to the Centre and State Governments on the PIL seeking ban on use of plastic bags in municipal areas which did not have a prompt garbage collection, segregation and disposal system. "Apart from the plastic choking the digestive system of the plastic residues enter the human food chain through dairy and animal products," he added.
